Excerpt: . have decided upon the dosage and inter-spacing of injections by clinical symptoms rather than based upon opsonic index determinations. Most clinicians have, in the first injection, used the dosage recommended by Wright but in subsequent injections have used such amounts as seemed warranted and indicated. Hektoen, adhering to the reliability of opsonic index determinations, holds that the index is of diagnostic and prognostic importance, while Park, Cole, Bolduan and others regard the index as unreliable for such purposes. ORGANISMS USED IN VACCINATION. Many of the species of pathogenic bacteria have been used in active immunization. Two kinds of vaccine treatment have been employed, one consists of the injection of killed cultures of the causal organisms and the other of the autoinoculation from the infected focus by means of massage and manipulation. In the injection of vaccines, so called stock culture vaccines and personal or autogeneuous vaccines have been used. It has been found that for some organisms, vaccines made from stock cultures will give as good results as will personal or autogeneuous vaccines. Stock vaccines have the advantage that no time need be lost in the preparation of the vaccine, and for nearly all of the species of bacteria causing infections amenable to treatment by active immunization, stock vaccines are equally as good as autogeneuous vaccines. The principle exceptions are the vaccines for Streptococcus pyogenes, Mic. pneumoniae and, according to some, for the Mic. gonorrhoeae. Some investigators have used vaccines containing several species of...
